This sad bereavement has fallen upon the hearts of the parents like a blight, or the withering mensoon of the desert. Yet, like the aged patriarch, they are permitted to exclaim that they know they cannot recall him to them, but if they prove faithful they will be permitted to go to him. And again, Christ has said "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of Heaven," and that their loss is his eternal gain. Like the flower that opes its petals to the morning sun, and easts its sweets to the gentle breeze, and when the eve approaches reclines its head upon the breast that gave it sustenance and life, and from whence it sprung—so has little David John burst upon the stage of action, smiled upon his parents, filled their hearts with the stage of action, smiled upon his parents, filled their hearts with pleasing thoughts of the future, and as sud-denly vanished away, and forever fled to the outstretched arms of the Redeemer, who will keep him until the "morn of the resurrection," where, if they are faithful, they may be permitted to dwell together again.
